

The first section of the book describes my inner state of misery while living in the USA and how it slowly fades away and finally vanishes altogether after I have lived in London for several years and decided to open a practice of psychotherapy there. America is a culture that breeds an overwhelming competitiveness between males and females for responsible jobs. Becoming self-sufficient economically is all that matters, and there is a dreadfully feverish race going on to emerge as the most successful economically between everyone, women included. This is the madness of the emotional plague. The plague narrows the horizon of success to purely dollars earned. There is no room for feelings and values that make individualized relationships of primary importance. The second section of the book is an ambitious attempt to describe the fundamental character differences between European and American women. American women are depicted as too hyped up as ego defended persons and are inferior to European women simply because the latter have retained their slower moving feminine instincts and softnesses. European women consequently are better able to surrender their egos to their man more completely when they love the man, and over time they teach their men how to do the same thing. I also attempt to describe the uniquenesses of the six women I have truly loved and there are no sharp boundaries of differences between the two categories of women. The third section of the book describes those man-man relationships between European professionals and myself that have taught me the most about the unending differences between male-male relationships. Why men have such enormous difficulty relating to one another in soul depth is also explored.
