

For maybe the first time in my whole life, Iâ€™m doing something really reckless. Beer. The nice kid is going to drink beer. Maybe the nice kid will get drunk. Maybe the nice kid will make out with somebody. Who knows what the nice kid might do on a warm, dark summer night? Tomorrow will be the last day of Noraâ€™s junior year. Nora heads for the party in the park, laughing and chatting with her friends, eager to leave her usual quiet, careful self behind. Other kids are drinking beer, flirting, pairing off, dancing. Even the hostile presence of a jealous ex-boyfriend canâ€™t spoil the fun. In a few hours, though, Mister Death will make his move. Nora hasnâ€™t yet seen his shadow, but we know heâ€™s getting ready. Heâ€™s the man who isnâ€™t there, the man no one notices, and he has a rifle. And heâ€™s going into the dark woods to use it. Nora and her classmates and their town will find out about him soon enough.

Mister Death's Blue-eyed Girls is not a traditionally structured narrative. While it feels like Nora's story most of the time, it is really a collective.

In a gripping story all the more chilling for its roots in a real-life crime that touched Hahn's (The Ghost of Crutchfield Hall) life, two Maryland.

Mister Death's Blue-eyed Girls. Written by Mary Central figures include Nora and Ellie, average high school girls bent on partying with friends. What no one. The high school year is almost over, there's a party in the park, and Mister Death will soon be there, rifle in hand.

Nora: If you see Buddy, tell him I hate him, Cheryl calls from the door. Mrs. O' Brien looks at us. Did Cheryl break up with Buddy? A long time. For maybe the first time in my whole life, I'm doing something really reckless. Beer. The nice kid is going to drink beer. Maybe the nice kid will get drunk. Maybe. In her newest book Mr. Death's Blue-Eyed Girls, she again visits her Maryland hometown and fictionally addresses the murder of two peers which shaped her as.
