

This black and white photo essay is designed to be read similarly to the National Geographic, where a significant portion of the meaning is embedded in pictures and picture labels. When the reader feels compelled, the book provides options for reading beyond the pictures. While the almonds were blooming during February and March of 2011; I collected notes, measurements, and photographs of my experiences in almond orchards in Turlock, California. Especially useful were the mass gains of the 100 plus nests that were distributed throughout the orchards. This data allowed me to quantify the degree that a nest was successful in attracting nesting females and in servicing the orchard. Four adjoining almond orchards are involved. Two are mid-blooming and two orchards are late blooming. As it worked out, subtle relationships were more easily exposed because the insects were exposed simultaneously to orchards with two different blooming periods. This setting allowed the examination of why early and late blooming trees, such as Ne Plus Ultra and Butte/Padre, can be difficult to pollinate with BOBs. A new BOB nest management paradigm is offered that states that HB colony location must be the top consideration when setting out BOBs. A key tenet of this new concept is that it is not the closeness of the BOB nest to the HB colonies, but instead it is the density of the overhead HB flight that affects BOB female establishment. An apparatus that is a logical outcome of the BOB/HB paradigm is described that might increase female nest establishment rates.
